The Small Ordinaries Accumulation Index was sold off 3.7% during November whilst the fund fell 2.3% (net of fees). High intra month volatility was again a feature of equity markets given ongoing uncertainty in macro conditions.

Market Outlook

We maintain our positive view although we are cognisant that a more definitive resolution on the European issues are necessary for sustained equity market performance. At present there is very little visibility or direction on how this might be resolved. Accordingly, we reduced some of the higher risk positions in the fund during the month of September as discussed in more detail below. We remain negative and underweight domestic cyclicals where the environment continues to be weak. We will continue to await tangible evidence of a pick-up in the non-mining domestic economy before contemplating investments in this space.

As for the structure of the fund, we still believe a slightly under weight resource position and an overweight resource services position is appropriate given the relative attractions of these sectors. Despite the risks discussed above, commodities will remain sought after as world economies recover and will also have appeal should further quantitative easing programs be adopted to stimulate growth – thus boosting the value of hard assets. Accordingly, the outlook for mining services stocks remains very compelling because the backlogs of projects have been undertaken and the subdued conditions in non-mining related sectors. This positioning is at the more aggressive end when compared to the small cap peer group.
